OVERVIEW

Global value chains (GVCs) have played a critical role in transforming economies in many developing countries by increasing their pace of industrialization, improving firm productivity, and creating new jobs. Yet, GVC formation has stagnated in the past decade due to saturation of possibilities for unbundling production, geo-politics, increasing local capacity and local sourcing in some developing countries, automation, and a global shift in demand away from goods toward services. The COVID-19 pandemic has further magnified some of these pre-existing trends.

Against this background, a new report, “An investment perspective on global value chains”, investigates what developing economies can do to maximize their opportunities for GVC integration. It focuses on how multinational corporations (MNCs) shape GVCs and highlights the role of their relationships with domestic firms. To facilitate sectoral transformation through GVCs, the report argues that policymakers in developing countries need to better understand the strategies of MNCs, help domestic firms internationalize, and ensure their policies create a conducive environment for these firms.

Through a guided discussion, this webinar will present the main findings of the new report. In addition, it will bring together a panel of policymakers and the private sector to draw on a range of international experiences, highlight new research and trends, and provide a platform for debate on emerging themes.

DISCUSSION TOPICS & THEMES

- What has been the role of multinationals in the expansion and shaping of GVCs?
- How do domestic firms internationalize, and how is this affected by interacting with MNCs through investment, partnerships (contractual arrangements) or trade?
- What types of policies and strategies can governments use to leverage foreign investment to integrate into GVCs?
- What has been the effect of the COVID-19 pandemic on multinationals, domestic firms, and GVCs, and how can policymakers prepare for a “new normal”?
